

Call for contributions

Call

In this year's IPL Conference, we are aiming for creating a day and a space for critical and caring discussions that creates room for different voices and different understandings of what is or could be meaningful in higher education. Underlying is a notion of the meaningful being contested and at stake.

We would like this to be a day of discussions and co-creation rather than performance, and therefore omit the usual paper presentation parallels-format. In this call for contributions, we invite you to write short online texts, based on the question What is meaningful in higher education?

The texts can be of different genres, such as thinking pieces, narratives and reflections on experiences, conceptual work as well short abstracts from research work. We welcome contributions from all people taking part in and across higher education – both academic and administrative staff, students, leaders ... and more. We especially encourage students to submit contributions in the form of thinking pieces and narratives.

Submissions

- The text must relate to the question What is meaningful in higher education?
- The texts can be shorter, but not longer than maximum 200 words.
- Your contribution must be signed with your name.
- Post your submission in the "task card" board

Sharing and working with the submissions

Your texts will be available online in an open "task card" board immediately on submission. This means that in the days leading up to the conference we will have the opportunity to read all the submissions as they are posted. In the conference the participants will engage with the submissions and bring them into the ongoing co-creative process during the day.
